I don't see that article, Lynn. But, yes – I understand Sr-90 had been used in various ways onsite, which is why it is listed as a radionuclide of concern (ROC). If you find the old article, please share.

Thanks, Yolanda,

Did you notice the 2001 article linked in the article you shared states that the reporter found historical records that documented the Navy's Strontium use? This may be common knowledge to you and the team, but it was new to me.

FYI - A few clips below. Angeles – Should this be shared with HQ (Dr. Waterhouse)? Brianna – this topic may inspire FOIAs.

Newly unearthed public records show that Five Point Holdings, the company with the rights to develop the shipyard, paid more than $1.3 million during 2020 to a consulting firm called Shipyard Advisors that consisted of Brown and two partners. Five Point continued paying $100,000 per month from the fall of that year through at least April 29, 2021, the last date public filings were available. In exchange, Shipyard Advisors was tasked with “facilitating communications between the various federal, state and local agencies to accelerate the completion” of the Hunters Point cleanup.

Emile Haddad, who stepped down as Five Point’s CEO in August, told financial analysts last March that his company had managed to gain new levels of access in San Francisco and Washington D.C.

“Now that we’ve seen the amount of influence that the State of California has in Washington, D.C., we now have started seeing a lot more movement,” Haddad said in a March conference call with financial analysts. “There’s a lot of discussion going on about accelerating the process at the highest level in government,” he added during another call in August.
